WELCOME TO MISSISSIPPI

In Mississippi, thousands of miles of modern, paved highways, and more than 2,000,000 friendly Mississippians bid you welcome. The highways you travel have been built to serve the tourist and to make possible fast, efficient movement of commerce which is so essential to the present-day economy. The responsibility for building and maintaining this system of roads is delegated to the State Highway Commission, a three-man elective body operating under authority granted by the State Legislature in supervising the far-flung activities of the State Highway Department.

Mississippi's present highway administration evolved over the years as highways and highway transportation grew in importance. In early years of the state, all roads, bridges and ferries were under the jurisdiction of County Boards of Supervisors. Under this system in 1912, the first concrete highway south of the Ohio River was built in Lee County.

In 1916, the legislature created the State Highway Commission, authorizing it to work with the County Boards of Supervisors in an advisory capacity in the construction of roads. A 1920 law broadened powers of the Commission, and in 1922, the state's first gasoline tax was levied. Mississippi's present system of roads and highways began taking shape in 1924 with a constitutional amendment permitting the legislature to designate highways for a state system and placing them under the jurisdiction of the Highway Commission.

There are now more than 9,400 miles of highways on this system, with 8,215 miles paved as of June 30, 1962. Construction schedules include continuing heavy outlays for further improvement of primary, secondary and urban sections of the system, and for construction of the new Interstate System.

The members of the Highway Commission represent each of the state's three Supreme Court districts. They are Roy C. Adams of Tupelo, representing the northern district; W. F. Dearman of Jackson, representing the central district; and John D. Smith of Mendenhall, representing the southern district.

They pledge to Mississippians, and to the countless thousands of visitors who come from other areas, a continued policy of sound planning and administration to the end that Mississippi Highways will always provide a pleasant invitation to the tourist, a convenience and source of economic strength to Mississippians.
